

Edward Jones and the Alzheimer's Association® Receive Halo Award for Corporate Social Responsibility and Cause Marketing

Financial services firm Edward Jones and the Alzheimer's Association have received a North American award for their strategic alliance formed just two years ago. The pair received a Gold Halo Award in the Best Health Initiative category at the Engage for Good Conference on May 24 in Chicago. The Halo Awards are North America's highest honor for corporate social initiatives and cause marketing and showcase successful consumer and employee engagement efforts.

"We are extremely grateful and honored to share this prestigious award with the Alzheimer's Association," said John Beuerlein, the principal who leads the Edward Jones Older Adult Council. "We're proud that Edward Jones has a culture of caring that empowers and supports all of us to work together to make a difference in the communities where we live and work. The Halo Awards recognition demonstrates the power of that culture."

The Halo Award is the second feat for Edward Jones and the Alzheimer's Association in recent weeks. The duo joined forces to set a new GUINNESS WORLD RECORDS(TM) title for forming the largest human image of a brain. The record was set on April 28 when 1,202 people gathered in centerfield at Busch Stadium (Home of the St. Louis Cardinals) to form a multi-colored brain image. The different colors represented the different lobes in the brain.
